Impact Account

Free to open and use

Charitable Impact doesn't charge sign-up or transaction fees for Impact Accounts. And, when you give from your Impact Account, more money can get to charities.

Processing fees from banks and credit card companies

Banks and credit card companies charge charities, including Charitable Impact, a fee to process donations.

Charitable Impact doesn't set or benefit from processing fees, but we do recover them. When you add money to your Impact Account, the bank or credit card company charges a fee to Charitable Impact to process the transaction. Later, when you give to charities, the charity receives your gift minus the processing fee charged to Charitable Impact by the bank or credit card company.

More money can get to charity when you give with Charitable Impact

The processing fee we recover from gifts is often lower than what a charity would pay for their own bank or credit card company to process gifts from donors.

Because of the large number of people using Charitable Impact to give, we're able to negotiate lower processing fees with banks and credit card companies. This means more money can end up in the hands of charities when you give from your Impact Account.

Processing fees don't affect your tax receipt

You'll receive a tax receipt for 100% of the amount you add to your Impact Account.
